There is, of course, no denying that women show less prowess in running, jumping, weight-lifting, and indeed all activities which require muscular strength, or weight and toughness of flesh or bone. Because of this, men in primitive societies monopolize the activities which carry most prestige, such as hunting and fighting, while the women stay at home and till the soil, gather in food and fuel, cook, clean and wash, look after the children and wait on the returning men-folk. In more sophisticated societies men have kept for themselves the occupations from which money could be made and which involve going out and meeting other men, while women have lived a narrower life of drudgery at home. Only recently have women had widespread opportunities to enter the professions or skilled employment.
