Clutter is the disease of American writing. We are a society strangling in unnecessary words, circular constructions, pompous frills, and meaningless Jargon.

Who really knows What the average businessman is trying to say in the average business letter? What member of an insurance or medical plan can decipher the brochure that tells him what his costs and benefits are? What father or mother can put together a child's toy on Christmas Eve or any other eve – from the instructions on the books? Our national tendency is to inflate and thereby sound important. The airline pilot who wakes us to announce that he presently anticipating experiencing considerable weather would not dream of saying that there is a storm ahead and it may get bumpy. The sentence is too simple—there must be something wrong with it.

(Good Luck)
